Constipation

The normal frequency of bowel movements varies widely from three a day to three a week. In general, though, you're probably constipated if you pass hard stools less than three times a week. In some cases you may also have a bloated feeling or abdominal cramping or pain

Signs & Symptoms

Not having a bowel movement every day doesn't necessarily mean you're constipated. You're nicely constipated, however, if you:

- Pass a hard stool fewer than three times a week
- Strain frequently during bowel movements
- Have abdominal bloating or discomfort

Causes

Normally, the waste products of digestion are propelled through your intestines by muscle contractions. In the large intestine, most of the water and salt in this mixture are reabsorbed because they're essential for many of your body's functions. If too much water is absorbed, or if the waste moves too slowly, you may become constipated.

A number of factors can cause an intestinal slowdown, including inadequate fluid intake, a low-fiber diet, inattention to bowel habits, age, lack of physical activity, depression pregnancy, illness, less water intake even stress.

Many medications, especially those used to treat Parkinson's disease, high blood pressure, some heart disorders and depression also can cause constipation. The same is true of most narcotics, & frequent use of laxatives often aggravates and may even cause constipation.

In rare cases constipation may signal more serious medical conditions such as colorectal cancer, hormonal or electrolyte disturbances, heart disease, gout and kidney failure.
